Adolescents (who are disabled for some reason) are an education system that represents adding to a public education process aimed at adapting to social life, regardless of developmental defects or economic difficulties. The term inclusive education is derived from the French word inclusive.

LITERATURE ANALYSIS

An inclusive education system is developing in Uzbekistan. Children with disabilities are also equal with healthy children. Children are being paid attention in every direction. Policy-making documents on education for children with special interests have been developed. The procedure for organizing inclusive education in secondary education organizations is outlined. "Simple" problems faced by children and their parents:

CONCLUSIONS

Parents of normally developing children sometimes fear that the presence of children in need of special help in the classroom may delay the development of their children. However, experience shows the exact opposite. Normally, the rate of developing children does not decline, and often their grades turn out to be higher in inclusive learning environments than in ordinary schooling. There is evidence that schools most successful in teaching and teaching children with disabilities are best for all other children at the same time. On the contrary, the best schools for all children are best for children with disabilities. In terms of behavioral, social development and academic achievement, especially speaking, the achievements of children enrolled in inclusive school are significantly higher. And the way peers treat atypical children directly depends on the firm position of adults and the climate in the classroom in general. Observations by American experts show that those who went to the gardens with preschool disabled children were treated with a much calmer and greater understanding of them than the teachers who first started working with them. Children with disabilities do not feel that way because of state attention. Capacity levels are expanding. Like healthy people, people with disabilities take their every step of the way. They also take the lead in entrepreneurship, science, craftsmanship, creativity, and other fields. They have unlimited options that are not limited in capacity actually!
